VICTORY

The war is won, surely, honorably and bravely.

Unanimous the sacrifice offered the transformed arms of a united world.

Even the German people, however once strong in its support and indomitable to its despotic power, have turned against it.

It is no longer the Kaiser, but the Hohenzollern, and it is no longer the German who commands, but a coalition government.

Our success has been won complete but we must not let it be forgotten that we have brought a great portion of the enemy to "the sea of oblivion."

Woodrow Wilson is the man, not only of the hour, but of all time's ages.

His magnified distinction has not only brought the way to a glorious conclusion, but has paved the way for a peace on solid foundations.

Every great victory has been brought to its knees, but our great people have been spurred and possessed to work out the problems along the wholesome lines of democracy.

The allies have triumphed, without causing a single calamity, which is almost unprecedented in a conflict of proportionate units.

German militarism is dead, but Germany will live on. American absolutism has vanished, but the Australian states are left free to follow their aspirations.

The allies which have made this battle struggle so terrible to contend, are now contending for the enemy, which is as it should be.

When the chronicle is completed it will leave the allies with a clear bill of health.

We may have made the physical victory more pronounced, but not with honor which is more important.

As it is, we can go before posterity without regret.

If there have been excesses, we are not to blame and if justifiable annexations to make reparation, we hold our temper.

Father history will record that the triumph of the allies over their own passions was even more remarkable than their armistice victories on the battlefield, and that is what our children and our children's children will like best to read.—Houston Chronicle.
